Wilson Wernick, a deputy attorney general, quit his post over Attorney General William Barr's leadership of the Justice Department, according to a report in The New York Times. The two men reportedly clashed over the handling of special counsel Robert Mueller's report. Wernick has been leading the Justice Department's efforts to notify people who may be affected by the Mueller report, as well as reviewing documents given to congressional committees. The news of Wernick's departure comes amid a growing consensus that Barr lacks the best person to be the nation's top prosecutor. Wilson Wernick, a deputy attorney general, quit his post over Attorney General William Barr's leadership of the Justice Department, according to a report in The New York Times published Monday. The two men reportedly clashed over the handling of special counsel Robert Mueller's report, which Barr has not yet released to the public. Wernick has been leading the Justice Department's efforts to notify people who may be affected by the report — as well as reviewing documents given to congressional committees, the report said. Democrats, who have accused Barr of mishandling the report, say they want Mueller's full, unredacted report available to the public. Wernick had planned to stay in his post through the end of the year but left a week ago, the report said. He will be replaced by Todd R. Edelman, a career Justice Department attorney, it said. A Justice Department spokesperson did not immediately respond to a request for comment. Barr did not say he was aware of Wernick's intention to resign when asked about it at a House Judiciary Committee hearing Tuesday. Wernick has reportedly faced pressure to resign after Barr, as the attorney general, did not recuse himself from the Mueller report review. Barr, as a private citizen, was reportedly on the board of an energy company run by a Russian oligarch named Oleg Derip
